Marc Lamuà calls for an “extraordinary mobilisation” on 29 November to stop the far right. The candidacy highlights plans for nearly 3,000 affordable homes by 2030 on 108 sites already identified

The PSC in the Girona region closed its campaign on Friday in Lloret de Mar with one goal for Sunday’s election: to win a third seat for Girona in Congress. The lead candidate, Marc Lamuà, argued that the seat could stop the far right in the constituency. “We’ve said it in every town: in Girona, three or a step backwards,” he said at an event with Senate candidate Gael Rodríguez and Lloret mayor Adrià Lamelas.

After fifteen days of meetings with residents, organisations and businesses, Lamuà identified housing costs and the continuity of services in towns and villages among the concerns that shaped the campaign. “They’ve spoken to us about how to pay the rent, how to make ends meet, how to maintain services in their communities,” he said. The candidate linked the third seat to the defence of pensions, wages and infrastructure investment.

On housing, the candidacy highlighted that it had already identified 108 sites where nearly 3,000 affordable homes are planned by 2030. The Socialists also championed investment in railways and roads, protection of the coastline and support for small and medium-sized businesses and local shops.

Adrià Lamelas brought the debate back to a specific issue in Lloret: ensuring that people who work there can also live there. The mayor identified housing, security and the transformation of the tourism model as challenges the municipality needs to address with support from the state. “We need a Spanish government that supports us and honours its investment commitments,” he said.

For his part, Gael Rodríguez called on young people to vote. The Senate candidate said that, despite the differences between coastal, inland and mountain municipalities, he had heard a shared demand: greater coordination between the state, the Catalan government and local councils. The candidates pledged to continue visiting Girona’s municipalities after 29 November to bring these demands to the institutions.
